Green Living: Green Litter!

Conventional cat litter is usually made from bentonite clay. This clay is extracted through strip mining, which can cause environmental damage. It also does not compost well, so it most often ends up in landfills. Alternative products include non-clay litters made from corn or wheat, reclaimed pine shavings, or even recycled newspaper. These are better for the environment than conventional litter products and are just as good at clumping and reducing odor.

Thoughts from Richard Steed

A sure sign of a great relationship is that the other person brings out the best in you. This doesn’t mean they make things easy for you! A good way to bring out the best in a person is by challenging them to BE their best. While the person challenged may feel some initial stress by being pushed out of their comfort zone, deep down inside they are developing a lasting self-confidence because they know you believe in them enough to challenge them.

Accepting challenges increases one’s determination. Being faced with a challenge is not a time to expect the all-too-sought-after “instant gratification” that so many people pursue and settle for nowadays. Rather, the gratification will come later—after some honest sweat, the successful honing of skills, and a tough job well done.

Our clients are regularly challenged by changing laws and evolving technology and they bring those challenges to us on a daily basis. I see these challenges as an opportunity to shine and I enjoy solving the challenges of my customers to ensure that their needs are permanently met. This gives me a deep and lasting inner satisfaction.

Challenges are a learning tool and a team builder. When our organization is challenged, we see it as an opportunity to pull the team closer together and figure out the best, most efficient way to handle the challenge.

The challenges our clients bring us are what ultimately brings out the best in us. I believe this is why we have such great relationships with our clients. Not a client yet? Challenge us!

Should Your Child Eat Snow?

When small children play outdoors in the winter, they invariably take to eating the snow that surrounds them. Many parents wonder whether it's safe to let their children ingest snow, due to pollution or other contaminants. Snow, just like water, can look clean, but could contain harmful substances. In urban areas, snow may contain industrial pollutants, while in farming areas, there may be pesticides in the snow. It can also be contaminated with bird or animal droppings, road de-icing solvents, or any number of other contaminants. Experts recommend discouraging your children from eating snow, since there is no way of knowing what it may contain. However, it is unlikely to cause any harm if your child ingests some snow before you're able to catch him or her. If it's only an occasional incident, there should be no serious harm.

Staying Safe While Shopping Online

As the holiday shopping season swings into full gear, consumers are logging onto their favorite websites to find the best deals. But the convenience of online purchasing comes with big risks. Javelin Strategy & Research's 2018 Identity Fraud Study found identity theft from e-commerce sites is 81 percent more likely than identify theft from physical stores. So, what can you do to protect your personal and financial information while shopping online?

Start by updating your passwords. They should be a minimum of seven characters long and contain a combination of numbers, letters, and symbols. Keeping track of a handful of passwords and remembering to change them is difficult at best, so invest in a password management application. Your login data is encrypted with one master password that offers access to all your favorite websites.

Only shop at websites that have secure socket layer (SSL) encryption installed. You can tell if a website uses SSL by looking for the lock icon in your browser's URL field. Secure URLs will also begin with "https" instead of "http."

Browsing for online bargains while sipping a latte at your favorite café can quickly turn into an identity theft nightmare. Be careful when using public WiFi networks. These networks are hubs for cybercriminal activity and make your online transactions vulnerable to hackers.

Many online retailers allow you to save your credit card number on their website for future purchases. Avoid this option. If the retailer's website is breached, your financial data could be stolen, too.

Stop Those Bounced Check Fees!

It used to be that if you did not have enough money in your account, your bank would decline your ATM or debit card transaction. It is becoming more common, however, for banks to accept the charge and then slam you with overdraft fees, often reaching $30 to $50. Do this several times in one day, and you can see hundreds of dollars in fees.

To add insult to injury, banks and credit unions often market this as a service, calling it "bounce protection" or "courtesy overdraft." But they will accept these charges without any warning to you, leaving you to deal with the fees that can pile up.

If you are one of many consumers who often have a low balance in your checking account or who don't balance your checkbook, you are at particular risk of incurring these fees. You can take some simple steps to keep your account overdraft fee-free.

Because of federal regulations, checks can clear almost immediately. You cannot count on floating checks anymore. To control better when money leaves your checking account, consider using online bill-paying. You can set the specific date for your payment to leave your account. Also, remember that ATM and debit card payments will typically post the same day. However, when using your debit card as a credit card, payments can still take a day or two to post.

While debits are processed relatively quickly, deposits can still lag when posting. Banks often put multi-day holds on deposits, especially in the case of large deposits. You cannot count on a deposit being available until you actually see it posted to your account.

If you use your debit card for hotels, rental cars or gas purchases, you may find that a portion of your available balance is tied up in "holds" placed by these companies to ensure payment of your bill. Often these holds are several hundred dollars, with this money unavailable until it is released by the company. Using a credit card is a better move.

You can request that overdraft protection be removed from your account. This way, any transactions you attempt that would be more than the amount available in your checking account would be declined instead of processed. You will still have to refrain from writing checks with no money in your account, as merchants can charge fees for returned checks as well. But removing this service will keep you from having any surprise charges.
